NEW TALES.

THE success which attended the publication in the columns of the "HONGKONG DAILY PRESS" of Original Tales by WALTER EBBERT and WILHELM COLLING having been much increased by the production of "Colonel Quaritch," by RIDER HAGGARD, we have decided to commence with the New Year another venture.

The First Story by the much admired writer

Mrs. MACQUOID, will be commenced in the "HONGKONG DAILY PRESS."

on SATURDAY, 5th January. It will consist of eight instalments and is entitled

MISS EYON OF EYONCOURT.

This will be followed by an original Novel by

S. BARKING GOULD,

author of "Mahaanah," "John Herling," &c.,

which will consist of Twenty-six instalments.

The writer holds the first rank among living novelists, and his works are so well known that no recommendation is required for his forthcoming one.

THE PENNYCOMEQUICKS, which will be commenced in the "HONGKONG DAILY PRESS" in February, on the completion of Mr. MAGQUID's story.

MISS EYON OF EYON COURT.

(Now First Published.)

"I begged your aunt," he spoke in his usual quiet tones, "as nothing unusual had happened. I have been here, but it seems that she had become tired of having me, so very bad taste on her part, wasn't it?" he said cheerfully. "I must own to you, my dear girl, that I had been vain enough to fancy you did not dislike me. You enjoyed that walk now, didn't you? You have enjoyed my company, or was it all a make-up and a sham? Don't tell me that you are a sham or I shall never believe another woman—you did enjoy it, didn't you?"

"Yes, I enjoyed the walk," then she added softly, "so far as that was ba-

"He made a low bow.

"Thank you, Mademoiselle. I cannot be too sufficiently grateful for your audience; and in the same way am I to conclude that you have tolerated my company because it gave you an opportunity of using your tongue?" He said this blithely, with a frank,坦率的 voice he added laughing. "Aha, little dog, you've caught you tripping. If I am no more to you than a muckie with which you dance, or an automaton to which you can speak, why were you at such pains to adorn your charming self in my honour. Ah!" he slipped his hands out.

"Forgive me," he said again, "you cannot deny it, he said joyously, as she blushed and looked at him.

"You must indeed forgive me, for I cannot help it. I have you, darling, with all my heart and soul; and yet how patient I am in spite of my impatience. The long and the short of it is you will be who to do as I wish. There is no one to help you. The woman you will not interfere with me what ever happens; and yet, sweet child, I do not even take your hand."

Marjorie was very hungry, so she was anxious to keep her chair on the stairs; she formed her only means of blockade; she drew up first one chair and then the other, but found this much harder work than it had been to slip them down the opening.

The woman looked at Marjorie's sleepy face and tumbled hair, and then at the bed. The quilt was rumpled, but the bed did not look as though it had slept. She sat the tray down on the dressing-table. Then she said, "You'll call here again."

"Clever little girl!" he said admiringly. "You have just brought me to what I wanted to express. If Miss Eyon had listened to me, you might have got to EYON Court, while I learned to love me well enough to wish to leave it in my company. I consider your aunt has driven you into this fatal position, and you see, unless you become my wife, well—she stretched out her hand, and Marjorie I don't see any other way open to you."

"What do you mean? What is to prevent me from going straight to Mrs. Locker tomorrow?" She forgot her emotion, and added impatiently, "If we had taken the right road this morning, we might have reached her to-night; it was your fault, you should have made the drive to the road."

Mr. Brown helped himself to the rest of the wine, and said, "I am sorry."

"Does little son, it is getting fractions. It must not, for a loss, be distractingly pretty that I might forget my good behaviour, and—

She gave him such a look of contempt that he stopped.

"Look here," he said, "we must end this. I have been very patient. I have behaved better than one man in a thousand would, and instead of rewarding me, you give yourself a bad and unkind thing. It is, therefore, better to go home again. You are nineteen, Marjorie Eyon, and therefore, you are not quite a child, and you have shown me that you have plenty of sense. Listen to me, do you really suppose that a girl can sleep with a man, and pass a night under the same roof with him—remember, there are witnesses who can prove this—and then go on her way as if nothing had happened to her. You have put yourself, in fact, into a very equivocal position."

"Well, instead of taking advantage of you, I have behaved in a extremely honourable way, and I ask you to marry me. You have only to say 'Yes,' that is all I ask you to do."

She had turned white while he spoke. Innocent as she was, she understood his words, and she dim dim for a moment that shame and disgrace might follow her to her friends. She put her hand to her forehead, it seemed as if every thing was becoming confused. Yes, she saw that what she had said was true, and oh, how horribly it was. Her eyes had waited to see whether she could have got out of the room, she might have found a safe refuge, but she had not.

"They are usually the most obstinate," he said.

"They are usually the most obstinate," he said. "They will not give enough to do anything really brave. A stronger woman would have tackled Mr. Brown with so much nerve and skill that the old woman would have been obliged to receive her. Well, I must hear the old woman, I suppose what he would say."

"They are usually the most obstinate," he said. "They will not give enough to do anything really brave. A stronger woman would have tackled Mr. Brown with so much nerve and skill that the old woman would have been obliged to receive her. Well, I must hear the old woman, I suppose what he would say."

She had turned white while he spoke. Innocent as she was, she understood his words, and she dim dim for a moment that shame and disgrace might follow her to her friends. She put her hand to her forehead, it seemed as if every thing was becoming confused. Yes, she saw that what she had said was true, and oh, how horribly it was. Her eyes had waited to see whether she could have got out of the room, she might have found a safe refuge, but she had not.
